

wearefeminism — speaker notes with slide cues

Open with: ``https://emmanueladusi.github.io/wearefeminism/index.html?present``

The presentation is always dark, always, regardless of what theme the site itself is set to. Nothing to toggle — just open the link.

→ or Space or clicker forward = next · ← = back · P = peek at where you are · Esc = exit

27 presses. Beat 0 is where you start, before you press anything. (Verified directly against the running code, not counted by hand — if this number and the slide deck ever disagree, trust the deck.)

The piece of the month now lands at the top of the section first, then moves on its own toward the photo after a few seconds. The gallery still opens on its own beat, one press before Dr. Munroe — no visible reveal animation either way, and her profile expands on its own once you reach her. One org on the Community wall (Black Women's Institute for Health) grows and lifts when that beat lands. See Changes made for the full list.

BEAT 0 · you start here. Screen: the wordmark, two m's

A lot of you may take a look at my website and think, "did he just come to this presentation with the word feminism spelt incorrectly?!" Yes, I did! However, that was on purpose. Not because I'm changing the word, rather the opposite, I'm building a community around it, and in the word community, there are two m's.

Good Morning folks! My name is Emmanuel Adusi, and in the fall I am heading to the University of Waterloo to complete the Honours Degree in Mathematics, with career aspirations of being a Quantitative Trader.

SLIDE CHANGE →

I do not face what they face.

I am a 17 year old 1.5 generation Nigerian-Canadian male. I was born in Nigeria, and I moved to Canada when I was one. Throughout my research last year, I was able to acknowledge that while I do not face the same subtle sexism experiences as some girls within the TDSB, I was passionate about conducting research on feminism because it helps me contribute to the solution.

SLIDE CHANGE →

the research question

My qualitative research question was simple: "How does the understanding of feminism affect the experiences of young girls within the TDSB ages 13-19?"

After conducting interviews, and making a video essay, my findings indicated two main themes:

SLIDE CHANGE →

It was not talked about at home.

Feminism was not talked about at home, especially in African households, with my very own father telling me that in his homeland, Nigeria 'They do not believe in it.'

(pause)

And that right there reminded me why I decided to embark on this project, not for my own personal gain, but to enhance people's knowledge of why they need a nuanced understanding of feminism. (Salami, 2020, p. 59)

SLIDE CHANGE →

It is misunderstood. (the word tangles)

My second finding was that there is misinterpretation when it comes to understanding what feminism is, causing it to be misunderstood. (Brand, 2018, p. 12)

(pause)

SLIDE CHANGE →

Belong. Thrive. (Thrive climbs)

I connected these findings to the MYSP focusing on the Belong and Thrive pillars

SLIDE CHANGE →

Let students lead. (an arrow draws) with my most prominent solution being: give students the chance to lead and get involved, with teacher involvement being mandatory.

SLIDE CHANGE →

The wearefeminism community is the change I wanted to see.

Last year, I had started my presentation with the words 'Change needs to start from somewhere, and that's me!' This year, my key message is: the wearefeminism community is the change I wanted to see.

(pause)

When considering what product to create in action research, I wanted to create something that someone could look at once, and be blown away, and as per usual, I delivered.

slides drop. The site appears and the wordmark builds itself

However, it is only a bunch of words if I do not back up my big talk, here's a look.

(pause — let the wordmark finish before you speak over it)

When you first open the site, the animation hits you, this was meant to show that we are building a community.

SLIDE CHANGE →

scrolls to the top of the piece-of-the-month section — the eyebrow, "This month's piece," the lead line. After about 2 seconds it keeps moving on its own, down toward the Maya Angelou photograph

As you scroll down, there is a piece of the month. In this, every month, it will cycle through a Black Feminist literature, artwork, or creative piece.

The photo takes a second to assemble itself out of ink as it arrives — that is deliberate, not a loading glitch. By the time the auto-scroll settles on it, give it that extra second before you start talking over it, same as the wordmark above.

There is also a spot right here for you to make a submission, and be featured on the website!

SLIDE CHANGE →

scrolls to About

At the bottom of my homepage, it talks about me. I put this here because yes, it is my work, but I feel everything above it is much more important, since this project isn't about me, it's about building a community.

SLIDE CHANGE →

goes to the Learn page. The hero animation plays: the collage assembles itself out of cut shards, then pulls back into a hung print

(pause — this one plays on its own, let it finish)

For my learning page, I thought, what would be the best way to teach about feminism?

SLIDE CHANGE →

the 44% pulse card

I surveyed 82 people, and 44% of those people said they find learning on topics about feminism boring.

(pause)

My second finding, people just didn't know enough about feminism, or where to find more resources regarding the topic.

SLIDE CHANGE →

A wave. A timeline. A game. (each one draws its own shape)

To fill in these gaps, I had run through many prototypes, at first I thought let me just do an interactive wave, and then I scratched it, and then I thought let me do an interactive timeline, and then I scratched it, and then I thought I hit gold when I thought about making a game, guess what! I scratched it! Each time I had started over, it was because I wasn't content, it wasn't the way I wanted to teach people about the topic.

SLIDE CHANGE →

So I asked someone.

But thanks to my peers in action research, I realized the best way to get ideas and insight is to ask other people, which led me to asking my brother, and he said just use art pieces, and then right there, it clicked.

(pause)

SLIDE CHANGE →

*Art locates African people as subjects, not objects. (Asante, 1980) — the gallery's own artwork now sits on this slide, the collage of two figures reaching across a sunflower, the same image that opens the Learn page

I came to the conclusion that at that very moment there was no better way for me to teach people about feminism than through using an Afrocentric method: An Art Gallery. Art is central to Afrocentricity as Molefi Kete Asante (1980), one of the leading Afrocentric scholars, noted that art is important in locating Africans as subjects, rather than objects of cultural and historical experiences. That right there, tackled my finding on the presurvey.

the gallery opens. No visible reveal animation — it's simply there, and it cycles through every room on its own (directory, lenses, all four waves, ~2 seconds each) for as long as you stay on this beat. This is the payoff, give it a second

Within my art gallery, I addressed my second presurvey finding. It is informative, featuring a part that talks about the different types of feminism, the different waves, and providing resources from scholars if people are interested in learning more, the scholars room. Dr. Munroe's card carries a gold ring and a "Featured" tag, and her profile opens on its own — the same panel a visitor gets from clicking her portrait with our very own Dr. Munroe being featured in it. Not only does my art gallery make feminism interactive and engaging to learn about, there are resources that are right in front of you so you cannot miss it.

SLIDE CHANGE →

SLIDE CHANGE →

the Play page, the Word opens

My website doesn't ignore that learning needs to be tested, it features games including a feminism themed wordle and a crossword!

Today's word is pinned to WEAREFEMINISM — see note 5. If you type it out live, that is what will appear on screen, on purpose.

SLIDE CHANGE →

the Community page, the organizations wall

You'll be able to take a look at organizations that girls can access,

SLIDE CHANGE →

The Wall

and you have your own wall so you can talk about your experiences in schools. It is moderated, so that we can maintain a safe space.

SLIDE CHANGE →

A resource every school can use.

In my next steps, I want my website to be a resource that can be used everywhere, and can be used as a resource for people in schools within the TDSB. I want to see actual change in people understanding what it means to be a feminist, not just claiming it blindly.

SLIDE CHANGE →

Workshops, with this as the main attraction.

I want to be able to host workshops where I can use my website as the main attraction there, that will keep people engaged.

SLIDE CHANGE →

An emotional roller coaster. (the line dips and climbs)

This process was an emotional roller coaster with many ups and downs. There were many times I had so many ideas, and I felt like I hit a state where I just wouldn't run out of ideas, and then I had those very irritating moments where I'd think of the BEST idea ever, and forget it the next second.

(pause)

However, overall, I enjoyed building this action research product, as I see it could make a difference. The action research turned out how I had planned, but being a greedy person, I always want to do more, and I always want to make the biggest difference I can make.

SLIDE CHANGE →

I would have run a workshop.

When I collected my feedback, something I wished I did differently was host a workshop so I could get more opinions. Yes, surveys are much easier to send out, and you can get them done quicker, but I feel a workshop allows for people to really say what they want to say.

SLIDE CHANGE →

I am. You are. We are. (the lights bloom)

Like I said countless times in this presentation, wearefeminism is a community. I am. You are. We are.

(pause — let this one sit longer than the others. It's the line the whole talk built toward.)

SLIDE CHANGE →

Thank you. Your name, the address, and a QR code to the site

Thank you for listening, and once again, my name is Emmanuel Adusi, similar to the name of my website, with two m's.

I would like to thank my pod leaders, Ms. Newell, Dr. Hardware, and Dr. Walker, and every other RA here as well. Without you guys, this would not be possible.

Leave this last slide up. It carries the address, your Instagram handle, and a QR code, so it holds through the applause and any questions — someone can scan straight to the site without typing anything.

Changes made

1. Rewritten to match your script. The wording throughout is yours, from the version you sent, not the version I drafted last pass — I only touched the odd typo ("Iam. Youare." → "I am. You are.", a stray open-parenthesis, a missing period). If a sentence here reads differently from what you meant, it's because I read it differently than you intended, not because I changed your meaning on purpose — tell me and I'll fix it.

2. The 44%-to-94% card is no longer on the tour. Your new script doesn't say a number there at all — it goes straight from Dr. Munroe to the Wordle beat. I dropped that beat from presenter mode to match: pressing forward no longer stops on the 94% card. The card itself still exists on the live site for anyone who scrolls there on their own; I just don't hold the talk on it anymore. Say the word if you want it back in the sequence.

3. The Community "submission" beat is off the tour — your script doesn't narrate "Submit a group we should add" on Community anymore. In its place, the "xxxx tab" line from your Home/piece-of-month section now has a real answer: a "Submit your entry here" link sits right under the piece of the month, mailto to ``wearefeminism@gmail.com``, next to the existing "Suggest a piece" link. Same beat as the piece of the month (no new slide change needed — your script doesn't put one there either). The Community ``#recommend`` section is still built and working for anyone who finds it on their own; it's just not a tour stop right now.

4. The key-message slide text changed to match. The big slide used to read "The wearefeminism community started from me." It now reads "The wearefeminism community is the change I wanted to see," to match the line in your script.

5. Wordle is pinned to WEAREFEMINISM, not the normal daily rotation — carried over from the last pass, unchanged here. To revert: ``js/wordle.js``, ``FORCE_WORD`` near the top, set it to ``null``. Tell me when.

6. The pod-leader thank-you moved to the very end, after "with two m's," with their actual names now in it — your script puts it there, not before "I am. You are. We are." like the last draft had it.

7. Two sentences were folded together where your script does that. The MYSP "Belong and Thrive" pillars and "let students lead" solution now read as one continuous thought in your script rather than two separate ones — I kept them as two slide changes on screen (the site already draws them as two distinct slides, Belong/Thrive then the arrow for "lead"), but the spoken line between them carries straight through with no pause forcing a break, same as you wrote it.

8. "What would be the best way to teach feminism?" moved earlier, onto the Learn-page-hero beat, right where your script puts a slide change before the 82-people stat — instead of sitting with the prototypes paragraph like the last draft had it.

9. The piece of the month lands at the top of the section, then moves on its own toward the photo. Landing straight on the centred photo skipped past the title and lead line, so now the beat opens on the section's natural top — eyebrow, "This month's piece," the lead paragraph — and after about 2 seconds moves on its own down to the photo, settling about 30% down rather than true centre so there's room below it once it resolves out of ink. The submission line ("Submit your entry here") sits on this same beat, right where your script puts it.

10. The Asante slide carries the gallery's own artwork; the gallery still opens on its own beat; Dr. Munroe's profile expands on its own. The photo you wanted on the Asante slide turned out to already be a site asset — ``img/art/learn-hero.jpg``, the same collage that opens the Learn page, rights already held. No file needed. The gallery beat right after it went through a few rounds: first merged with the scholars beat into one, then split back into two on your call — you didn't want that beat removed. What's changed from the very first pass is that neither gallery beat shows a reveal animation anymore: the ~900ms portal-grow effect is skipped entirely while presenting (``Gallery.html``'s ``openGallery()`` checks for ``?present`` in the URL), so both beats simply show the room, already there, no growing circle. On the scholars beat, her card is also clicked automatically, opening the same expanded profile panel a visitor gets from clicking her portrait themselves.

11. One organization spotlights, sized to actually read at a glance. Black Women's Institute for Health grows to 1.35× and lifts above its neighbours, centred in the frame rather than just scrolled to the top of the section — the first pass (1.14×) was too subtle to call "clear," so this landed bigger on your ask. Presenter-only, set by a `spotlight` flag on that one entry in `js/directory.js`. Say the word if you want a different organization highlighted instead; it's a one-line change.

12. The gallery-opens beat cycles through every room on its own. Directory, lenses, and all four waves, about 2 seconds each, looping for as long as you stay on that beat — scholars is deliberately left out, since that's the next beat's own reveal and cycling into it here would fight the auto-expand. Stops the instant you press next or back; picking the beat back up (either direction) always restarts the cycle fresh from the directory.

If you lose your place

Press P. A small card appears at the bottom left with the beat number, what you are on, and what is next. It fades on its own and the audience will not read it.
